Applied Social and Community Psychology:

A Doctoral Program for Psychology in the Public Interest

Training

Students work towards the Ph.D. degree.

Faculty and students participate in collaborative research with both public and private organizations in local, national, and international communities.

Our mentor-based training model builds the theoretical foundation and applied research skills necessary to develop, implement, and evaluate interventions and policies addressing important problems of society.

Graduates are employed in local, state, national, and international settings, including academic institutions, government and non-profit agencies, and private industry.

Coursework

Program coursework includes training in:

- Community psychology
- Social psychology
- Translational science
- Social and behavioral health
- Inequality and social justice
- Research methodology
- Advanced statistical methods
- Program development and evaluation

Individual programs of study are tailored to the student's research interests and career objectives.
